The Secret Language of Flowers

In the nineteenth century in the United Kingdom, society had strict rules that told people how they should behave. These included rules about how to dress, how to eat, and how to speak properly. One of the most important rules was about (18). People thought it was not right to express feelings too much, especially in public. Because of this, people had to find other ways to share how they felt in order to respect society's rules.

During this time, a special method of sharing feelings was used. This method was called "floriography," which means the language of flowers. Each flower had its own meaning, which let people send secret messages that could share love, friendship, or even a hidden dislike without saying anything. For example, giving someone red flowers could mean deep love, while giving yellow flowers might show disappointment or not being happy with someone. This became a useful way for British people at that time to share their feelings (19).

Today, people often communicate through texts and e-mails, but the full meaning of people's thoughts is not always clear with just written words. (20), floriography is becoming popular again. People are starting to see the value of using flowers to communicate. This is because each flower can hold a deep message that might be difficult to express with only words. It is likely that the new interest in floriography shows that people are looking for more personal ways to express their feelings to others.

Green Revolution

After World War II, the world's population grew quickly. (21), it became more and more difficult to feed everyone with traditional farming. In countries like India and the Philippines, where population growth was a big challenge, they looked for better ways to produce food. This effort is known as the Green Revolution. During this revolution, scientists developed seeds that produced more crops, chemicals that helped plants grow, and chemicals that got rid of insects. These quickly began to be used all over the world.

Plants need a chemical called nitrogen to grow. They use their roots to take in nitrogen that is found in the soil. Chemicals developed during the Green Revolution used a lot of nitrogen. (22), those special chemicals helped plants grow, but sometimes, people used too much at the wrong time. This made nitrogen go into the land, rivers, and seas, which polluted the environment.

Nowadays, to reduce the impact on the environment, some people promote a movement that recommends that people follow four "rights." It encourages people to use the right chemicals in the right amount, at the right time, and in the right place. In some areas, AI has been introduced to help people do this. Instead of spreading equal amounts of nitrogen across the land where crops are grown, AI detects how much nitrogen each plant needs at all times. This helps prevent farmers from adding more nitrogen (23).

Blues

Blues is a type of music that started in the southern part of the United States over one hundred years ago. It was made by African Americans who were going through tough times. They sang to share their sad feelings and express the difficulties they were having. However, blues is not only about unhappy feelings. Instead, it is also about not giving up in difficult times. Over time, the music has spread to different parts of the country, resulting in various types of blues music.

Delta blues is the original type of blues, and it is still considered the main type of blues. In Delta blues, singers play the guitar in a unique way. They do this by using a glass tool on their fingers. By sliding it along the guitar strings, they make special sounds. The original Delta blues singers also came up with a special singing style called "call and response." This is a form where the singer sings a line, and other band members and the audience respond to it.

In the twentieth century, many African Americans on southern farms moved to northern cities, including Chicago, in search of job opportunities and a better life. They brought blues music with them but hoped to create something new. Instead of singing about the difficulties of life on farms, they began to sing about everyday city life. They started to use electric guitars so that more people in crowded, noisy indoor environments could hear them. The use of electric guitars became a symbol of Chicago blues.

Blues has not only developed into different types of blues itself but also influenced different types of music. Delta and Chicago blues both focus on guitar music, and this influence can be seen in modern rock music. Also, the strong expression of feelings has been passed down to rock music. Expressing emotions is a big part of rap music, too. Just like in blues, rap artists openly talk about their experiences and feelings, often sharing social messages, which was a big part of the original Delta blues.
