Jaguars in Argentina

Jaguars are the largest species of cat in North and South America. In some areas, jaguars have disappeared because of hunting by humans or the loss of natural food. Especially in Argentina, where most jaguars lost their places to live, it is said that there are only a few hundred jaguars across the country. To improve the situation, some organizations have been working to (18) in the Iberá Wetlands in Argentina. They are believed to have become extinct in this region more than seventy years ago.

To reintroduce jaguars, (19) were developed. First, five jaguars were brought to the conservation center to have babies. Then, the baby jaguars were put in a restricted area with no human contact. Finally, the young jaguars born in the center were released into a larger area along with the jaguars brought in from Brazil. The females, which tend to stay within a smaller territory, were released first. This is because males often establish territories where females are. This made monitoring them with GPS easier.

The fact that jaguars have successfully had babies at the center and that a few babies have now been born in the wild can be considered proof of success. The greatest achievement may be the creation of this method itself. (20), there are many challenges to successfully conducting such a method in other areas. For example, there is a need for countries and regions to provide animals. Also, there is a need for the understanding of local people and neighboring countries.

Silbo Gomero

The Guanche people lived on a small island, now one of Spain's Canary Islands, before Spain invaded the area. Their land was covered with mountains, so it was important for them to (21). To reduce the need to walk even a short distance in such a difficult landscape, the Guanche people developed a language using whistles, which are special sounds people make with their mouths. After the Spanish invasion, the whistled language was adapted into Spanish and became known as Silbo Gomero.

When people on the island whistle, they use high and low tones, short and long tones, and different rhythms to express different letters of the alphabet. By putting together these different sounds, they express different words. (22), as long as they learn how to make different sounds when they whistle, they can communicate easily, following ordinary Spanish grammar. It was a useful tool for people in cases like warning each other about mountain fires or missing goats.

The use of the Silbo Gomero language began to decline in the twentieth century due to a decrease in population and the appearance of mobile phones. However, in the 1990s, efforts began to save the language. If a language is used by the next generation, its survival is more likely. Therefore, as part of the effort, a law was made to (23). Now, some people are trying to use Silbo Gomero in their daily lives and at cultural events.

Making Choices

People must make all kinds of choices every day. This starts when they are children and continues throughout their adult lives. However, this does not mean that people need to give all choices the same level of consideration and time. For example, people can easily make choices like what to eat, where to park, or when to wake up. On the other hand, they often spend a lot of time thinking about bigger life decisions, such as which school to go to, when to get married, and what career to follow.

People often think that having more choices is a good thing. However, some researchers disagree, and they conducted a study. In their experiment, they set up a table in a local supermarket in California. First, they created a display that let customers sample six different types of jam for one hour. Then, they made a different display, this time with twenty-four types of jam. Surprisingly, although fewer customers stopped to try the jam at the six-jam display, more customers actually purchased the products from this display than at the display with twenty-four types of jam.

This result may seem to be hard to understand at first. An owner of a supermarket would believe that they could increase their sales by increasing the choices. This is because more options would certainly match more customers' needs. However, this study shows that more choices do not always lead to great results. When people are given too many choices, the differences between each option become unclear, making it difficult to compare. As a result, people find it harder to choose.

Another negative impact of having too many choices is that it makes people less happy. Having many choices means there are also many things that they are not able to choose. Because of this, they end up feeling regret. According to experts, to avoid this, it is important to set a time limit on making choices and to try one's best not to think about it once decisions are made. Otherwise, the things that people did not choose could make them feel unhappy.
