Gray Wolves

The gray wolf is an animal that can be found in North America, Europe, Asia, and other areas. Gray wolves live in forests, snowy places, and other places. Gray wolves used to live all across the United States, but recently, most gray wolves have only lived in the northern areas of North America. In the 1970s, only a few hundred gray wolves lived in the southern area of the United States.

The main reason the gray wolves disappeared is that they were hunted by humans. In the 1800s, humans went to live in the western areas of the United States and cut down trees to build houses. Therefore, the gray wolves lost their homes and had to go to new places close to humans' houses. They ate people's pets or animals on people's farms. Humans did not like this, so they hunted the gray wolves. Then, the number of gray wolves decreased.

This created a new problem in the 1900s. Gray wolves originally ate animals in the forests. However, because there were fewer gray wolves, other animals lived longer. These animals ate many plants. People realized gray wolves helped the forests by eating the animals that ate the plants.

In 1974, the American government made a new rule. The rule said no one could kill or hurt gray wolves. Because of this, in just forty years, the population of gray wolves grew in the southern areas of America. The gray wolves helped the environment a lot. The number of other animals decreased, and the number of plants increased.
