From: Blake Jones <blake.jones.0710@round-message.com>
To: Jacob Kennedy <j.k.1018@eletter-cloud.com>
Date: October 30
Subject: A job at a ski resort

Dear Jacob, How are you doing? This winter, I'm going to work a part-time job at a ski resort. I'll stay there while I work as a staff member for a short time. I thought you might be interested in this opportunity. If so, please check the information below. You need to send a message to the ski resort by November 5. Then, you will have an online interview on November 10.

The job includes many different roles at the resort, like serving customers in the gift shop and handling requests to rent equipment. It also includes clearing snow from the streets. Working in the cafeteria or hotel is not part of the job. You will be working five days a week for about one month. Some work will be done in the evenings instead of during the day. The rest of the week will be spent freely.

I should tell you about what you will receive at the ski resort. First, three free meals are served every day, even on the days you don't work. Also, you are allowed to ski or snowboard there for free. And you will have a free room just for yourself. However, it is not in the same hotel where the customers stay. If you have any questions, you can ask during the interview. Thank you, Blake Jones

Social Media for Mental Health

Today, people often talk about the negative effects of social media. However, social media can positively influence mental health. In fact, it seems to be helpful for many people with mental health problems. While some of them go to a doctor for help, others rely on social media and try to improve their mental health with information they find on it. One reason for this is that they may be able to find useful information for free.

A study of over 1,000 young people showed their positive experiences on social media. During the study, they shared several good things about social media. For example, more than half of them said that they could feel safe when they were having a hard time, thanks to social media. Also, many of them said that they felt accepted. In other words, they believe they can feel connected to others and get support from them on social media.

However, one expert says that trying to solve mental health problems through social media is not necessarily good. This is because some information should not be trusted or is not professional. For example, a study was performed to check how much information on social media about a particular mental illness could be trusted. The results showed some of the information was actually wrong. If people use such information to treat their mental illness, it could have a negative impact on them.

In this way, there are times when social media can work in a negative way. To avoid these situations, the expert suggests there is something people can do. For example, if people want to use the Internet to get information about mental health, they should check that the information comes from experts in the field. That way, social media can truly help mental health, and people can find help from social media.
