大問4B 長文

本文を読み、次ページのQ26-Q29に答えなさい。

Houses Made of Bamboo

Bamboo is a plant that grows thin and tall. It is often used to make paper and chopsticks and frequently appears in Asian dishes and household items like baskets. One of its features is that it can take in more carbon dioxide than many other plants. Carbon dioxide, or CO2, is a gas created especially by human activities and can cause climate change. Bamboo can help the environment by taking in the gas people produce.

Another important feature of bamboo is that it is very strong, which makes it perfect for building houses. Although bamboo is very light, it is said to be much stronger than the wood that is generally used for buildings. Also, trees usually die when they are cut down. However, bamboo grows back again even if it is cut down. These unique features make it a popular choice to build houses with.

For these reasons, bamboo has been used for thousands of years for home building in Asia. According to some experts, it has been an important resource for some Asian countries because of its low cost. Also, the warm climate in those countries helps bamboo to grow well. Indeed, it can grow very fast and live for over twenty years. This is why a lot of bamboo is used in Asian countries.

On the other hand, bamboo is not popular for buildings in places like Europe and the United States. One reason is that people there are not very familiar with bamboo for building houses. Bamboo is also difficult to grow in colder places in those areas. However, some companies are trying to take advantage of bamboo's useful features for home building outside of Asia. Therefore, perhaps bamboo will be used more for buildings around the world in the future.
