Coffee Culture

In England, coffee houses have been important places for meeting and talking for centuries. These places first opened in Oxford in the middle of the seventeenth century and were the beginning of a popular tradition. However, coffee houses were not just places to enjoy a hot drink or a light meal. They quickly became favorite places for customers to share ideas and news with each other. (18), their main attraction was not drinking coffee but the opportunity to debate and discuss culture with others.

Each coffee house had its own character. This attracted different people depending on the house's location and the topics that customers were interested in discussing. (19) could find a place to talk and be listened to. This created a new style of communication in which the speakers were equal. However, though these gatherings sometimes included women, the people who usually came were men.

Coffee houses were more than just places where people could have conversations. They also played an important role in business and politics of the time. For example, one company in the United Kingdom grew from a coffee house into a global insurance market. There were challenges, such as when the king of England tried to shut down coffee houses due to worries about the topics that were being discussed there. Still, coffee houses continued to exist. Over time, they have changed to follow social trends. Nowadays, they offer a quiet place for work or a casual place to meet, showing how these spaces have (20).

大問2B 長文の語句空所補充 Q21-Q23

次の英文A, Bを読み, その文意にそって(18)から(23)までの()に入れるのに最も適切なものを選びなさい。

Satellites

Satellites are like computers that go around the earth. They can do many different things. By looking at the pictures of the earth taken from satellites, scientists can see how clouds move and predict the weather. Satellites can also send radio waves (21). This is because they operate in space and travel much higher than the radio towers. This makes them important for communications such as radio and TV. Furthermore, satellites for the Global Positioning System (GPS) always send data, and people can find out their location with their smartphones.

(22), it was only countries that developed and used satellites. However, as the demand for more accurate data and technology for communications and broadcasting increased, private companies also began to use satellites. Since then, more development in technology occurred, which has led to new and better types of satellites being created. However, it is said that there are too many satellites going around the earth these days.

While more and more satellites are being sent into space, the number of (23) has also increased. However, because it is very difficult to collect objects from space, old satellites are usually left in space. There, they move around the earth with other satellites that are still being used. Having too many satellites not only makes them more likely to accidentally run into each other but also causes problems with the information they are trying to send.

大問3A Your membership

メールを読み、次ページのQ24-Q26に答えなさい。

From: Max Harper <m.harper@westvalley.fitness.com>
To: Sarah Johnson <sarah_johnson1234@kmail.com>
Date: October 6
Subject: Your membership

Dear Sarah,

As the customer service manager at West Valley Fitness Center, it makes me very happy to say congratulations on being a member for one year. We're excited to share that we've added new services to make your fitness experience even better. For example, there are personal trainers, a variety of classes, a pool, and new gym equipment. These additions are because we want to make West Valley Fitness Center the best gym in the area.

To celebrate your one year of membership, we're offering you a free personal training session. Also, we'd like to invite you to a members-only health seminar next month. To sign up for the personal training session or the health seminar, please follow the instructions on our website. To further promote good health, we're introducing a new online magazine feature: Member Spotlight Stories, where we share the fitness stories of members like you. If you're interested in being the subject of one of these stories, speak to someone at our front desk on your next visit.

Your feedback on the new services and any additional features you'd like to see at the center is always welcome. Just reply to this e-mail. Finally, if there's anyone you'd like to recommend our gym to, let us know! We'll offer them a discount on their first year of membership.

Kind regards,
Max Harper
Customer Service Manager

大問3B 長文

本文を読み、次ページのQ27-Q31に答えなさい。

Bonobos

Bonobos are animals that look similar to monkeys and chimpanzees. Not many people know about bonobos because they do not live in many different areas. They live in just one area of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, in the middle of Africa. If people find out that they have something in common with them, they might feel more connected to them.

Many people probably believe that humans are the only animal that is capable of caring about others. However, this is not the case. In one study, two bonobos were placed in rooms separated by a fence. An apple was hung from the top of one room, and only the bonobo in the other room could reach and release the apple by climbing the fence. Even though they did not get any apples or reward themselves for helping others, the bonobos often dropped the apple when there was another bonobo in the other room. Surprisingly, these bonobos were strangers to each other.

In a different test, bonobos watched two videos. In one video, their family members were yawning, the act of opening their mouths when they were sleepy. When bonobos watched their family members yawn, they were also likely to yawn themselves. Another video showed strangers yawning. The bonobos who watched this video yawned as much as when they watched their families yawn. In a similar setting, humans were more likely to yawn after seeing their friends or family members yawn than after seeing strangers yawn. This suggests that bonobos' ability to feel one another's feelings is more widespread than that of humans.

Bonobos' ability to care about others is probably due to the group structure that they live in. This becomes clear when we look at chimpanzees. Bonobos live in large groups where there is no clear leadership. However, there is a distinct power structure within a chimpanzee group, and a large, strong male takes on a leadership role. Because of this, they have less reason to be friendly. Bonobos, however, live in peace and work together more because of how their groups are set up, while chimpanzees are more unfriendly.
